The shake-up of Macron's domestic team in the Elysee Palace — the first in 20 months — comes after a series of foreign policy gaffes and sliding polls have revived old questions of Macron's suitability for the presidency. Prime Minister Edouard Philippe, the center-right's favourite, and Defense Minister Jean-Yves Le Drian, the centrist's former foreign minister, have resigned. Philippe quit on Wednesday, telling his former UMP ally that Macron was moving in a direction he didn't agree with. Le Drian's decision to go ahead with a planned trip to Finland on Saturday irked some of his allies and made it more likely he would be replaced by former prime minister Alain Juppe. The French leader's decision to dismiss Philippe and Le Drian, who clashed over how to respond to the war in Syria, was aimed at improving his standing among his party base and allaying doubts about his own ability to impose himself on other political parties. But centrist senators who have long been hostile to Macron's party, Les Republicains (LR), criticized his decision to fire Philippe and Le Drian. "This is a cabinet reshuffle for internal reasons," Senator Eric Woerth, a former defense minister, said on RMC radio. He said Philippe and Le Drian's resignations were "unavoidable" after the government adopted an unpopular budget. "Emmanuel Macron is responsible for Philippe's choice. But he wants to show that he wants to change," Woerth said. On Thursday, French voters went to the polls in a divisive second round in the elections to the European Parliament. The far-right National Rally has gained ground since President Donald Trump's shock election victory last year but the centrist Macron's team is in second place, just 19 seats behind the far-right alliance.Self-reported seropositivity of HIV infection among indigenous Australians.
